Psychological Resilience

- is an individual's tendency to cope with stress and adversity.
- Psychologists have identified some of the factors that make someone resilient, among them
- A positive attitude
- Optimism.
- The ability to regulate emotions.
- The ability to see failure as a form of helpful feedback.

Risk factors

- Difficult temperament
- Low self esteem
- Negative thinking style
- Family disharmony, instability or breakup
- Harsh or inconsistent discipline style
- Parent/s with mental illness or substance abuse
- Peer rejection
- School failure
- Poor connection to school
- Difficult school transition
- Death of family member
- Emotional trauma
- Discrimination
- Isolation
- Socioeconomic disadvantage
- Lack of access to support services

Protective factors

child

- Easy temperament
- Good social and emotional skills
- Optimistic coping style

family

- Family harmony and stability
- Supportive parenting
- Strong family values

school

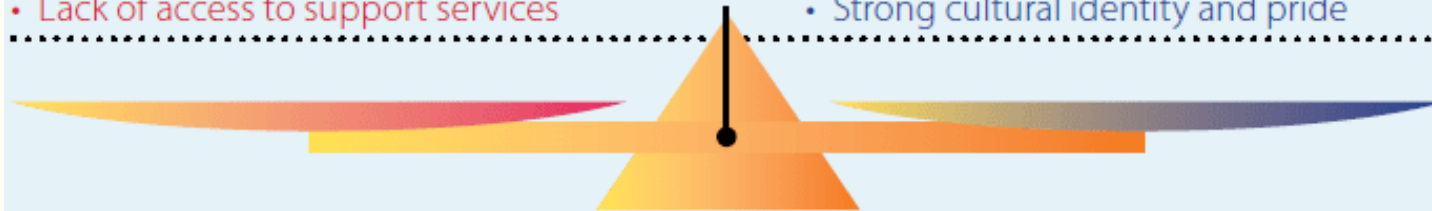

- Positive school climate that enhances belonging and connectedness

life events

- Involvement with caring adult
- Support available at critical times social

- Participation in community networks
- Access to support services
- Economic security
- Strong cultural identity and pride

Why Is Resilience Important?

Transitioning

- Returning to the community from Residential.
 - Ageing out of Foster Care.
 - Leaving Probation.
 - Completing Community Treatment Programs
- Education & Treatment Alternatives have leveled the playing field for all students by providing access to one platform for complete and current information regarding college and career readiness

The Dilemma

Students are not adequately being prepared for post-secondary and career readiness.

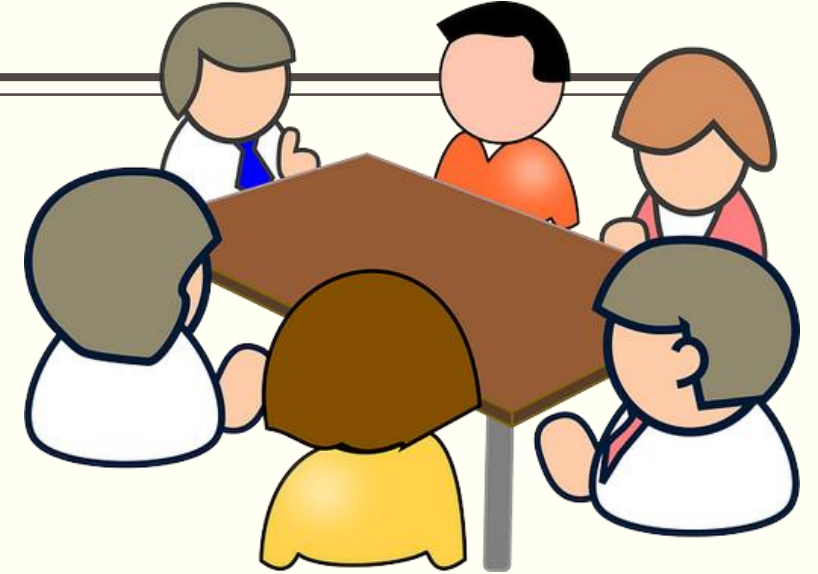

- Among recent graduates, less than 1 in 10 have taken a foundational set of courses they need to be post-secondary and career ready.
- Nearly half did not complete a college or career prep course sequence.
- Only 8 percent of high school graduates completed a full post-secondary and career preparatory curriculum.
- Post-secondary and career readiness is still a new expectation that will require a significant change to school structures.
- Rather than aligning high school coursework with students' future goals, high schools are prioritizing student coursework to classes that will aid them in meeting graduation requirements.

MISSION STATEMENT

By providing students and parents with an ongoing roadmap to make informed decisions regarding post-secondary and career choices, TPC constructs a 6th - Grade to 16 series of building blocks which encourages students to consider all possible Post-secondary and career options.
